Who is My Supervising Editor?

Please remember to consult with your supervising editor whenever you have any questions about anything editorial, such as needing to discuss a paper, not sure whether to send out for review, not sure whether to ask for a revision, wondering about possible political issues, or having any other dilemma.

The Deputy Editor to whom you are assigned should be your first point of contact. Routine e-mail and phone discussion between these editors is encouraged in making decisions about what to accept, what revisions to demand, how to reconcile competing reviews, etc. This discussion will not only help prevent problems, but will educate all involved parties. If you and your Deputy Editor cannot resolve the issue, the Deputy can take the issue to the senior editor group for discussion and feedback.

This process should improve communication and identify problems earlier in the decision-making process, hopefully making it more efficient for both editors and authors (reducing unnecessary work and misunderstandings).

Anytime a new editor is added to the Journal, the list of supervising editors is updated. If you have a question about who your supervising editor is, please contact Martha Villagomez (mvillagomez@acep.org) and she will let you know.
